Report Of Outside Consultants
On
Proposed B.S. In Journalism
At
Southern Connecticut State College

We are convinced by our visits here at Southern Connecticut State College that a Major in Journalism is needed and would be highly valuable. We believe the College is well prepared to offer a Major in Journalism, in view of the courses available, and the quality of the members of the department who teach the courses.

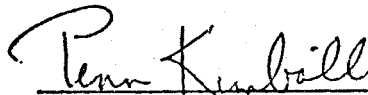

It was clear from our conversations with the very considerable number of students we talked to that they themselves very much want a Journalism Major. The stimulating nature of the courses themselves, and of the Internships that most of them are taking, was obvious in the enthusiasm they expressed.

We suggest that the establishment of a Journalism Major should facilitate the further integration of the total needs of the program, such as courses in Electronic News Gathering, Photography, Graphics, and Public Relations. In short, we feel that a Journalism Major should be regarded as a Multi-Media effort. We would further recommend establishment of a properly equipped newsroom for the regular use of Journalism students.

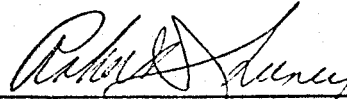

We were impressed with the role of Ms. Robin Glassman, both as an obviously inspiring teacher and Coordinator for the Journalism program. We believe however, that thought should be given to reinforcing the present teaching staff with possible new positions if this major is adopted to carry on this fine beginning.

Response to the Evaluation Report

Concerning a Proposal for a Major in Journalism

In response to the recommendations of the panel of consultants concerning Southern Connecticut State College's proposal for a journalism major, Dr. Martin Anisman, Dean of Arts and Sciences, and Mrs. Robin Glassman, Journalism Coordinator, support the integration of journalism courses with courses in related areas, such as electronic news gathering, photography, graphics and public relations. The Coordinator has worked with faculty members in these and other areas to develop courses and to make them available to journalism students. In the proposed B.S. program for journalism majors, students are required to develop cognates of 12 to 18 credits in fields related to their career goals. At present the college provides a wide range of courses for their selection, and many departments are preparing proposals for new courses to increase offerings in these related fields.

In regard to the establishment of a properly equipped newsroom for journalism students, the administration has established this as a priority, and has made allocations for 1978-79 for the purchase of equipment, and will do so for each succeeding year. The administration has also established the hiring of a fulltime faculty member for the journalism program as a priority for 1979-80.

We are grateful to the consulting team for their expert advice concerning the proposal for a journalism major.
